

AIRPORTWATCH SOUTH WEST

PRESS RELEASE

EMBARGO: 01.00 hrs 12 July 2008

SWRDA ditches support for airport expansion because economic benefits unproven

The regional development agency has concluded that there is not enough proof of the economic benefits from airport expansion and will not be putting any further funding into expanding the region's airports.

The news of this decision has been broken today by campaigners opposing airport expansion at Bristol and other airports in the South West after they obtained the information from the South West Regional Development Agency (SWRDA) under the Freedom of Information Act.

The campaigners from the AirportWatch South West coalition (AWSW), the umbrella for groups opposing expansion at six airports in the South West, have strongly welcomed SWRDA's verdict ruling out any further support by the development agency for expansion at the South West's airports.

SWRDA's report on sustainable aviation policy, prepared by economic and social development consultants EKOS questioned "whether any RDA investment in airports can be reconciled with 'economic growth' within environmental limits" and went on to admit that "air travel may not necessarily be a pre-requisite for economic growth," and "the relationship between high growth sectors in the region and air travel appears to be weak."

The report includes measures of economic importance such as direct and indirect employment.

It shows that in the longer term, employment at airports will actually fall between 2015 and 2030, as efficiency improvements such as automatic check-ins will "reduce employment densities." It concludes: "We estimate that employment growth will not be linear to passenger growth."

Based on this report, SWRDA's Board agreed not to "make any further investments in airports for the purpose of increasing passenger capacity." They also agreed to actively support measures for "greening" airport operations such as improved surface access, particularly by public transport, and said they would lobby specifically for improved rail connections from the South West to London Heathrow.

AWSW coordinator and Stop Bristol Airport Expansion spokesperson Jeremy Birch says: "We have always been told that the economic benefits of airport expansion at Bristol airport outweigh the considerable environmental impacts of noise, traffic and climate changing emissions. This report makes it clear that not even the local development agency now believes this and have stopped putting money into airport expansion. However, it's a pity they have not told anyone but the airports about this in the six months since they made the decision.

"SWRDA still needs to recognise that airports can never be genuinely "green" while they continue to increase the amount of climate damaging emissions they produce. We're now calling on them to actively fund greener alternatives to air travel and to work to oppose further expansion at the region's airports."

AirportWatch South West, is made up of campaigners opposing expansion at Bristol, Exeter, Staverton (Gloucestershire), Bournemouth, Newquay and Plymouth airports, all of which are facing significant expansion, and is a regional group of the national organisation AirportWatch.

The group forms a regional voice to oppose airport expansion across the South West by lobbying national and regional government as a united group.
